

For The Men . . . Questions Men Ask of Women

Why does my wife bring up things that happened five years ago?

Why does my wife see my need for space as trying to escape from her?

Why does my wife ask, "Do you love me?" when I just said it that morning?

Should I share every struggle I am having with her, or are there things that are better that I keep from her?

What is the right answer to "Do these jeans make me look fat?"

What does "fighting fair" mean to women?

I know she says she enjoys sex, so why doesn't she ever initiate it?
If sex is free and fun, why not have a lot of free fun?

How can my wife say that she thinks I'm good-looking and even irresistible, but that doesn't mean she wants to have sex?

How often do I need to tell my wife that she is beautiful before she starts believing it?

How come my wife tells me I need to communicate to her more, but she also tells me that I am just suppose to know certain things (like her moods or what I've done wrong) without her telling me? Isn't that a double standard?

Why is it when I am ten minutes late getting home she automatically assumes something horrible has happened to me?
Sometimes I am just late.

How can she say "Your not listening!" when I have just been listening for the past half an hour?
